Part 2 to Plaintiffs' Memorandum of Law
In Opposition to Motion to Dismiss or For Summary Judgment
by the United States and the Official Capacity Defendants

(In Shubert v. Bush, 07-693)

1. Principles of Separation of Powers

"It is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is." Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. 137, 177 (1803). This duty is especially great where constitutional rights are at stake. "[A]lthough the attempt to claim Executive prerogatives or infringe liberty in the name of security and order may be motivated by the highest of ideals, the judiciary must remain vigilantly prepared to fulfill its own responsibility to channel Executive action within constitutional bounds." Zweibon, 516 F.2d at 604 (plurality opinion). It is particularly "the duty of the courts to be watchful for the constitutional rights of the citizen, and against any stealthy encroachments thereon." Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1, 40 (1957) (citation omitted). Here the Executive seeks through the back door of a narrow, common law evidentiary privilege to undermine at least four major constitutional principles: the right of plaintiffs to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures, see U.S. Const. amend. IV; the right of plaintiffs to a judicial forum to assert their constitutional rights, see Webster v. Doe, 486 U.S. 592, 603 (1988); the constitutional right and duty of Article III courts to "say what the law is," Marbury, 5 U.S. at 177; and the constitutional limitations upon the Executive to exert power unauthorized by Congress within the domestic sphere, see Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579, 587 (1952).

"Ours is a government of divided authority on the assumption that in division there is not only strength but freedom from tyranny." Reid, 354 U.S. at 40; The Federalist No. 47 (James Madison) ("The accumulation of powers, legislative, executive, and judiciary in the same hands . . . may justly be pronounced the very definition of tyranny"); Hamdan, 126 S.Ct. at 2800 (Kennedy, J., concurring) ("Concentration of power puts personal liberty in peril of arbitrary action by officials, an incursion the Constitution's three-part system is designed to avoid."). These fundamental separation of powers principles and the obligations of Article III courts are not altered in wartime. In Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, 542 U.S. 507 (2004), which reversed on due process grounds the dismissal of a citizen "enemy combatant's" petition for habeas corpus, the Supreme Court held that "we have long since made clear that a state of war is not a blank check for the President when it comes to the rights of the Nation's citizens." Id. at 536 (plurality opinion); see Ex Parte Milligan, 71 U.S. 2, 120 (1866) ("The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men, at all times, and under all circumstances. No doctrine, involving more pernicious consequences, was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government."); Youngstown Sheet, 343 U.S. at 650 (Jackson, J., concurring) ("Aside from suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus in time of rebellion or invasion, when the public safety may require it, [the founders] made no express provision for exercise of extraordinary authority because of a crisis. I do not think we rightfully may so amend their work."). "Whatever power the United States Constitution envisions for the Executive in its exchanges with other nations or with enemy organizations in times of conflict, it most assuredly envisions a role for all three branches when individual liberties are at stake." Hamdi, 542 U.S. at 536 (plurality opinion).

Another core constitutional principle–relevant to the extent defendants argue that the state secrets privilege is rooted in Article II–is the President's traditional *in*ability to assert Commander-in-Chief and "foreign affairs" powers within the domestic sphere. In the great Steel Seizure case, striking down President Truman's executive order seizing steel production facilities in order to avert a strike during the Korean War, the Supreme Court held that the President's power does not extend to regulating private domestic activities, however connected to the actual conduct of war: "The order cannot properly be sustained as an exercise of the President's military power as Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces . . . . Even though 'theater of war' be an expanding concept, we cannot with faithfulness to our constitutional system hold that the Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces has the ultimate power as such to take possession of private property in order to keep labor disputes from stopping production. This is a job for the Nation's lawmakers, not for its military authorities." Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U.S. 579, 587 (1952).

The Complaint, of course, alleges that the President has expanded "foreign" warrantless intelligence surveillance into the homes of millions of ordinary Americans within the United States. The President has admitted to authorizing a warrantless spying program upon thousands of persons in the United States, where at least one party to the call is within the United States.[18] The Complaint alleges that defendants' spying program is even broader, involving a warrantless surveillance dragnet of millions of calls and emails by millions of people within the United States, both where the calls/emails are entirely within the United States, and where at least one end of the calls/emails are within the United States. See Compl. ¶¶ 1-3, 53-90. In short the Complaint alleges a domestic spying program, in the United States, affecting millions of American citizens, most of whom have never even traveled abroad on holiday, much less to affiliate with the Al Qaeda terrorist network. This case falls within the heartland of Youngstown, another factor the Court must consider when evaluating defendants' sweeping claims of privilege.

Another core separation of powers principle applicable here is "the deeply rooted and ancient opposition in this country to the extension of military control over civilians." Reid, 354 U.S. at 33; see id. at 23-24 ("The Founders envisioned the army as a necessary institution, but one dangerous to liberty if not confined within its essential bounds."); Laird v. Tatum, 408 U.S. 1, 15 (1972) (recognizing "a traditional and strong resistance of Americans to any military intrusion into civilian affairs" that "has deep roots in our history") (emphasis added); Youngstown Sheet, 343 U.S. at 632 (Douglas, J., concurring) ("[O]ur history and tradition rebel at the thought that the grant of military power carries with it authority over civilian affairs."); Toth v. Quarles, 350 U.S. 11, 13 (1955) ("[A]ssertion of military authority over civilians cannot rest on the President's power as commander-in-chief, or on any theory of martial law."); Al-Marri v. Wright, 2007 WL 1663712, at *27 (4th Cir. June 11, 2007) ("[A]bsent suspension of the writ of habeas corpus or declaration of martial law, the Constitution simply does not provide the President the power to exercise military authority over civilians within the United States."). As the Supreme Court wrote in 1957, "[t]he country ha[d] remained true to that faith," a faith "firmly embodied in the Constitution," for "almost one hundred seventy years." Reid, 354 U.S. at 40. "Another half century has passed but the necessity of 'remain [ing] true to that faith' remains as important today as it was at our founding." Al-Marri, 2007 WL 1663712, at *28.

This core constitutional principle is very much at stake here, where the President seeks to justify a spying program upon the American people by the intelligence arm of the Department of Defense, based upon a war against a foreign terrorist organization. "[N]o doctrine that the Court could promulgate would seem . . . more sinister and alarming than that a President whose conduct of foreign affairs is so largely uncontrolled, and often even is unknown, can vastly enlarge his mastery over the internal affairs of the country by his own commitment of the Nation's armed forces to some foreign venture." Youngstown Sheet, 343 U.S. at 642 (Jackson, J., concurring).

2. The State Secrets Privilege

With this backdrop, we turn to the doctrine of the state secrets privilege. The origins of the privilege in this country date to the Aaron Burr trial, in which Burr moved for a subpoena duces tecum ordering President Jefferson to produce a letter by General James Wilkinson. The government argued "that the letter contains material which ought not to be disclosed." Riding circuit, Chief Justice Marshall held that if the letter "contain[s] any matter which it would be imprudent to disclose, which it is not the wish of the executive to disclose, such matter, if it be not immediately and essentially applicable to the point, will, of course, be suppressed." United States v. Burr, 25 F.Cas. 30, 37 (C.C.D.Va. 1807) (emphasis added). Of course, if the material were "immediately and essentially applicable to the point," it would not be suppressed, notwithstanding the "impruden[ce]" of disclosure. Id.

After Burr, two doctrines developed: a narrow doctrine covering espionage agreements, and a somewhat broader state secrets doctrine. The first espionage case was Totten v. United States, 92 U.S. 105 (1875). There, the administrator of a former spy's estate sued the government based on a contract the spy allegedly made with President Lincoln to recover compensation for espionage services rendered during the Civil War. Id. at 105-06. The Totten

Court barred the action because "[t]he service stipulated by the contract was a secret service; the information sought was to be obtained clandestinely, and was to be communicated privately; the employment and the service were to be equally concealed. Both employer and agent must have understood that the lips of the other were to be for ever sealed respecting the relation of either to the matter. This condition of the engagement was implied from the nature of the employment." Id. at 106. In short, the plaintiff's decision to become a spy operated as a waiver of his ability to enforce the espionage agreement. In Tenet v. Doe, 544 U.S. 1 (2005), the Court essentially reaffirmed Totten, holding that two alleged Cold War spies could not sue the CIA to enforce an espionage agreement.

Like the limited espionage doctrine, the state secrets privilege first grew out of cases involving persons who worked with or for the military. The first modern state secrets case, United States v. Reynolds, 345 U.S. 1 (1953), arose out of the death of individuals who volunteered to observe a secret test run of a B-29 aircraft carrying sensitive military equipment. Id. at 3. The decedents chose to volunteer for a sensitive military mission, and as in Totten, plainly must have known that the mission was to remain a secret. After the flight crashed, killing three civilian observers, their widows sued the government under the Federal Tort Claims Act and sought discovery of the Air Force's official accident investigation report. Id. at 2-3. The Secretary of the Air Force filed a formal "Claim of Privilege" and refused to produce the accident report. Id. at 4-5. Defendants, however, did volunteer to "produce the three surviving crew members, without cost, for examination by the plaintiffs" in a sworn deposition, id. at 5, an offer plaintiffs rejected, id. at 11. There was also little reason to believe that the secret information (concerning the sensitive "electronic equipment") had "any causal connection with the accident," and therefore there was little necessity for the accident report. Id. at 11.

Reynolds first defined the state secrets privilege. It applies only where a court is satisfied "from all the circumstances of the case," that (1) "there is a reasonable danger that compulsion of the evidence" will (2) "expose military matters" which (3) "in the interest of national security, should not be divulged." 345 U.S. at 10 (emphasis added). Reynolds did not extend the privilege to any matter that could impair national security, only "military matters." Id. "When this is the case," i.e., when this three-part test is met, "the occasion for the privilege is appropriate." Id.[19]

The Reynolds Court noted that "[j]udicial control over the evidence in a case cannot be abdicated to the caprice of executive officers." Id. at 9-10. Yet, at least where "military matters" which "in the interest of national security, should not be divulged" are concerned, the Court did not require that the government "automatically" provide "complete disclosure" of the secret information before the claim of privilege would be accepted. Id. The Court further held that "[i]n each case, the showing of necessity which is made will determine how far the court should probe in satisfying itself that the occasion for invoking the privilege is appropriate. Where there is a strong showing of necessity, the claim of privilege should not be lightly accepted." Id. at 11. The Court also held that "even the most compelling necessity cannot overcome the claim of privilege if the court is ultimately satisfied that military secrets are at

[19]The Reynolds Court also imposed certain minimal procedural requirements: the state secrets privilege "belongs to the Government and must be asserted by it . . . . There must be a formal claim of privilege, lodged by the head of the department which has control over the matter, after actual personal consideration by that officer." Id. at 7-8 stake." Id. The Reynolds Court, of course, had no occasion to consider whether this would be the case outside the context of Totten and Reynolds, where plaintiffs themselves contracted with or worked with the military.

The Reynolds holding was perfectly sensible. The case plainly dealt with a "military matter," i.e., a military mission involving persons flying on a military aircraft. The Court's decision was also animated by another critical factor: plaintiffs had little necessity for the withheld information. "[W]here necessity is dubious, a formal claim of privilege, made under the circumstances of this case, will have to prevail." Id. at 11. In Reynolds, necessity was "dubious," because it was "greatly minimized by an available alternative [sworn depositions of the surviving crew], which might have given respondents the evidence to make out their case without forcing a showdown on the claim of privilege. By their failure to pursue that alternative, respondents have posed the privilege question for decision with the formal claim of privilege set against a dubious showing of necessity." Id.

Another critical factor in Reynolds was the lack of any reason "to suggest that the electronic equipment . . . had any causal connection with the accident. Therefore, it should be possible for respondents to adduce the essential facts as to causation without resort to material touching upon military secrets." As the Court held, "[r]espondents were given a reasonable opportunity to do just that, when petitioner formally offered to make the surviving crew members available for examination. We think that offer should have been accepted." Id.[20] [20]As noted in § II(A), supra, Reynolds also did not involve a statute "contemplating the trial of actions that by their very nature concern security information." Halpern, 258 F.2d at 44. Where, as here, such a statute applies, the state secrets privilege does not apply. Id. (expressly distinguishing Reynolds).

The Reynolds holding must therefore be understood within the context of (1) a plainly military operation, involving (2) decedents who chose to join the military mission, and (3) plaintiffs who had at best a "dubious" need to learn about state secrets that (4) were not even causally related to the claim, and who (5) refused alternative methods of discovery (such as depositions) to prove their case. Reynolds also did not have occasion to consider the privilege in the context of executive encroachment into the domestic sphere, cf. Youngstown Sheet, nor in the context of the "military['s] intrusion into civilian affairs," Laird, 408 U.S. at 15. Nor did Reynolds consider the privilege in the context of a plaintiff asserting constitutional claims. Cf. Webster v. Doe, 486 U.S. 592 (1988).

Like this case, however, Webster did involve constitutional claims. There, an employee fired by the Central Intelligence Agency (apparently because of his sexual orientation) brought claims against the agency under, inter alia, the First, Fourth, Fifth and Ninth Amendments of the Constitution. The Supreme Court held that Section 102(C) of the National Security Act of 1947 could not exclude judicial review of the constitutional claims. Id. at 603. In reaching that conclusion, the Court noted the "serious constitutional question that would arise if a federal statute were construed to deny any judicial forum for a colorable constitutional claim." Id. (citation omitted). Although the Director of the Central Intelligence Agency "complain[ed] that judicial review even of constitutional claims will entail extensive rummaging around in the Agency's affairs to the detriment of national security," id. at 604, the Court permitted the case to go forward. Citing Reynolds, the Court gave the district court "latitude to control any discovery process which may be instituted so as to balance respondent's need for access to proof which would support a colorable constitutional claim against the extraordinary needs of the CIA for confidentiality and the protection of its methods, sources, and mission." Id. Thus, thirty-five years after Reynolds, the Supreme Court authorized courts–at least in cases asserting constitutional claims– to "balance[]" plaintiff's "need for access to proof" as against the "extraordinary" national security needs of the government. Id.

(i) The Ninth Circuit and the State Secrets Privilege

Kasza v. Browner, 133 F.3d 1159 (9th Cir. 1998), like Reynolds a tort case involving no constitutional claims, is the leading Ninth Circuit case on the state secrets privilege. Like Totten, Tenet, and Reynolds, and unlike this case, Kasza involved plaintiffs working for or with the United States military. Plaintiffs were former workers at a classified Air Force facility who brought environmental tort claims arising from conduct on the military facility itself. Id. at 1162. Like Reynolds, Kasza did not involve any encroachment of the executive into the domestic sphere, cf. Youngstown Sheet, nor any "military intrusion into civilian affairs," Laird, 408 U.S. at 15, nor any constitutional claims, cf. Webster, much less claims affecting fundamental checks and balances, separation of powers, and the compelling Fourth Amendment claims set forth here. Kasza was a tort case on behalf of workers at a military base, concerning matters on the base.

Even though the two related cases in Kasza concerned conduct on a military base, and even though neither case raised any constitutional claim, neither case was dismissed at the outset of the litigation. Rather, in the first case (Frost) "discovery got underway," Kasza, 133 F.3d at 1163, then the Air Force refused on state secrets grounds to provide most documents plaintiffs requested, concerning operations on the base. At the conclusion of discovery, the Court granted the Air Force summary judgment. Id. In the related Kasza action, the government produced declarations refuting plaintiff's claims on the merits, as well as inventory and inspection reports to the court in camera. Id. at 1164. Based upon those reports, the district court ruled that, as to various injunctive claims, defendants were already providing relief and the claims were moot. The court also denied defendants' summary judgment motion on other claims, a ruling later mooted by subsequent events. Id.

The Kasza court, again carefully limiting the state secrets privilege to "military matters," held that, for the government to successfully withhold evidence claiming state secrets, the government must satisfy the court "under the particular circumstances of the case" that "there is a reasonable danger that compulsion of the evidence will expose military matters which, in the interest of national security, should not be divulged." Kasza, 133 F.3d at 1166. The court concluded that release of information about activity on the Air Force base would reasonably endanger national security interests, id. at 1170, and affirmed the grant of summary judgment.

(ii) Other Circuits and the State Secrets Privilege

Only a handful of state secrets cases in other circuits have dealt with issues similar to those in this case, and those cases (1) predated Webster, and (2) did not involve a statute such as FISA, cf. Halpern, 258 F.2d at 43-44. In Halkin v. Helms, 598 F.2d 1 (D.C. Cir. 1978) ("Halkin I") and Halkin v. Helms, 690 F.2d 977 (D.C. Cir. 1982) ("Halkin II"), plaintiffs sued the government to enjoin alleged wiretapping by the government. In neither case did the court simply dismiss the suit. In Halkin I, plaintiffs "succeeded in obtaining a limited amount of discovery," id., 598 F.2d at 4-5, before a number of plaintiffs' claims were dismissed. In Halkin II, "[a] large number of documents responsive to plaintiffs' [discovery] requests were produced." Id., 690 F.2d at 984. In addition, the CIA identified various plaintiffs who were surveilled and specified to some degree how they were surveilled. Id. at 985 n.28.

In both Halkin I & II, the court (which, again, did not have the benefit of Webster) applied Reynolds and refused to balance plaintiffs' interests in disclosure with the government's interest in protecting national security. Halkin II, 690 F.2d at 990. Dissenting from the court's denial of the petition for rehearing en banc, Judges Bazelon and Wright wrote that "[o]nly a total disregard for the importance of the Fourth Amendment interest could lead the panel to decide this case without first considering" the Keith case, and accused the panel of "us[ing] the evidentiary privilege to immunize conduct that appears to be proscribed by the Fourth Amendment." Halkin I, 598 F.2d at 13.

The dissenters were, of course, largely vindicated in Webster, which limited the Reynolds test and required courts to "balance [plaintiffs'] need for access to proof which would support a colorable constitutional claim" against the "extraordinary" security needs of the government to protect, inter alia, "methods, sources, and mission." Webster, 486 U.S. at 604. Another case that did not have the benefit of Webster was Ellsberg v. Mitchell, 709 F.2d 51 (D.C. Cir. 1983). There, former defendants and attorneys in the "Pentagon Papers" case brought a damage action against persons who allegedly subjected them to warrantless electronic surveillance. The government provided substantial discovery, identifying a number of the plaintiffs who had been wiretapped and where the surveillance occurred, id. at 53-55, but refused on state secrets grounds to answer other interrogatories. On appeal, the D.C. Circuit ordered the government to provide the names of the persons who authorized the wiretaps, but refused to order other (undisclosed) discovery to plaintiffs. Id. at 59-60. The court did not dismiss claims concerning wiretaps the government had conceded, "see[ing] no reason . . . to suspend the general rule that the burden is on those seeking an exemption from the Fourth Amendment warrant requirement to show the need for it." Id. at 68. The court, however, did dismiss the claims of persons for whom wiretapping was not conceded. Id. at 65.

Halkin I, Halkin II, and Ellsberg did not have the benefit of the Supreme Court's teaching in Webster, that–at least where constitutional claims are at issue–courts should "balance [plaintiffs'] need for access to proof which would support a colorable constitutional claim" against the "extraordinary" security needs of the government to protect, inter alia, "methods, sources, and mission." 486 U.S. at 604. Nor did they involve a statute, such as FISA, that "contemplat[es] the trial of actions that by their very nature concern security information." Halpern, 258 F.2d at 44. This court should therefore apply the Supreme Court opinion in Webster, and the relevant Second Circuit opinion in Halpern, not the outdated (and in any event, non-controlling) precedent from the D.C. Circuit.

C. The State Secrets Privilege Does Not Apply to a Massive, Illegal Program That Reaches Into the Heartland of This Country and Violates The Constitutional Rights of Millions of Ordinary Americans

Even if FISA did not preempt the state secrets privilege, which it plainly does, see supra § II(A), this case cannot be dismissed at the pleading stage for four additional, independent reasons: (1) By its own terms, the state secrets privilege does not apply to this case; (2) Webster, not Reynolds, controls when constitutional claims are at stake, and Webster requires balancing of the parties' interests, not dismissal; (3) Reynolds, which was decided in a considerably different factual context, does not require dismissal; and (4) defendants' actions are not secret, and therefore not "state secrets."

1. Because This Case Concerns Civilian, not "Military Matters," the State Secrets Privilege Does Not Apply

As this Court observed in Hepting, "most cases in which the very subject matter [of the case] was a state secret involved classified details about either a highly technical invention or a covert espionage relationship." Id., 439 F.Supp.2d at 993. There is good reason for this. The Reynolds holding, by its own terms, dealt only with "military matter[s]." 345 U.S. at 10 (privilege applies only where "there is a reasonable danger that compulsion of the evidence will expose military matters which, in the interest of national security, should not be divulged."). The secret test flight of a B-29 bomber (Reynolds), the covert spy relationships with President Lincoln (Totten) and with the CIA (Tenet), and operations on an Air Force base (Kasza), are all plainly core "military matters."[21] But if Youngstown Sheet teaches anything, it is that the encroachment of the military into the purely civilian affairs of ordinary Americans, e.g., spying

[21]The great majority of state secrets cases similarly concern core military matters and/or persons who worked with or for United States intelligence or the military. See, e.g., Sterling v. Tenet, 416 F.3d 338 (4th Cir. 2005) (CIA covert agent's employment lawsuit against CIA); Edmonds v. United States Dept. of Justice, 323 F.Supp.2d 65 (D.D.C. 2004) (action by terminated FBI employee); Tilden v. Tenet, 140 F.Supp.2d 623 (E.D.Va. 2000) (CIA employee suit against CIA); Bareford v. General Dynamics Corp., 973 F.2d 1138 (5th Cir. 1992) (defective weapon causing death of sailors in Iraqi missile attack); Zuckerbraun v. General Dynamics Corp., 935 F.2d 544 (2nd Cir. 1991) (malfunction of missile defense system aboard U.S. Navy frigate); In re Under Seal, 945 F.2d 1285 (4th Cir. 1991) (action by government contractor for failure to renew contract involving "highly-classified program"); Department of Navy v. Egan, 484 U.S. 518 (1988) (denial of security clearance to Trident Naval Refit Facility, which services Trident nuclear weapons); Fitzgerald v. Penthouse Int'l, Ltd., 776 F.2d 1236 (4th Cir. 1985) (Navy and CIA "dolphin torpedo" and "open-ocean weapons systems"); Molerio v. FBI, 749 F.2d 815 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (FBI refusal to hire plaintiff as a special agent); Northrop Corp. v. McDonnell Douglas Corp., 751 F.2d 395 (D.C. Cir. 1984) (defense contractor subpoena of Department of Defense concerning sale of military equipment to foreign countries); Military Audit Project v. Casey, 656 F.2d 724 (D.C. Cir. 1981) (FOIA request concerning secret CIA project to raise sunken Russian submarine from the Pacific Ocean floor); Farnsworth Cannon, Inc. v. Grimes, 635 F.2d 268 (4th Cir. 1980) (action by Navy contractor against Navy employee for loss of Navy contract) (cases all cited by defendants).

upon hundreds of millions of phone calls and emails that have nothing to do with the military or with foreign intelligence, is a civilian matter. Id., 343 U.S. at 587; id. at 642 (Jackson, J., concurring) ("[N]o doctrine that the Court could promulgate would seem . . . more sinister and alarming than that a President . . . can vastly enlarge his mastery over the internal affairs of the country by his own commitment of the Nation's armed forces to some foreign venture."); id. at 644 ("The military powers of the Commander-in-Chief were not to supersede representative government of internal affairs . . . . Congress, not the Executive, should control utilization of the war power as an instrument of domestic policy."); id. at 632 (Douglas, J., concurring) ("[O]ur history and tradition rebel at the thought that the grant of military power carries with it authority over civilian affairs."); Al-Marri, 2007 WL 1663712, at *28 ("[I]n this nation, military control cannot subsume the constitutional rights of civilians.").

Were it otherwise, there is nothing the military could not do within the wide landscape of this country that could not be cloaked by the state secrets privilege. If, for example, the military secretly took over the nation's entire telecommunications network in order to monitor Al Qaeda, revelation of this program (which might tip off Al Qaeda) could arguably impair national security. If the military secretly took over the broadcast networks in order to control the airwaves, suppress pro-Al Qaeda news stories, and spread anti-Al-Qaeda propaganda, revelation of this program (which would damage the credibility of the propaganda) could also impair national security. Even though these Executive actions would violate the Constitution, see Youngstown Sheet, they could not be revealed much less enjoined, because revelation of just about any program involving the military–no matter how invasive of domestic affairs or obnoxious to the Constitution–could arguably impair national security.

Thankfully Reynolds precludes such plainly absurd results. Reynolds carefully included only purely "military matters" within its holding. It did not invite the government to extend the state secrets privilege into the civilian arena, and for good reason. We have long enjoyed a "deeply rooted and ancient opposition in this country to the extension of military control over civilians," Reid, 354 U.S. at 33, and to "any military intrusion into civilian affairs." Laird, 408 U.S. at 15. Extension of the state secrets privilege to conceal and essentially sanction such "military intrusion," id., would run head first into this ancient and vital constitutional doctrine. See id.; Youngstown Sheet, 343 U.S. at 587.

Reynolds dealt with a limited and traditional application of the state secrets privilege, one confined to a purely "military matter": the secret flight of a B-29 bomber. Reynolds therefore carefully limited the privilege (and its holding) to "military matters." The state secrets privilege does not apply in this case, see id., nor could it, see Reid, 354 U.S. at 33; Laird, 408 U.S. at 15; Youngstown Sheet, 343 U.S. at 587.[22]

2. The Supreme Court Case in Webster Requires Balancing of the Parties' Interests, not Dismissal

Even if the eavesdropping of hundreds of millions of private conversations and emails between parents and their children, between spouses, co-workers, friends, doctors,

[22]This is not to say that the Executive has no interest at all in maintaining the confidentiality of some aspects of the Dragnet program. But such interests can be accommodated by more traditional remedies, see, e.g., Webster, 486 U.S. at 603, and, in any event, do not trump this Court's "province and duty. . . to say what the law is," Marbury, 5 U.S. at 177, nor plaintiffs' interests in vindicating their rights under the Fourth Amendment and three separate federal statutes.

teachers, accountants, judges, the clergy, et al. were somehow a "military matter," the state secrets privilege would not require dismissal of this case.

Where constitutional claims are at stake, Supreme Court precedent requires a balancing of the parties' interests, not dismissal. Reynolds did not involve constitutional claims. Reynolds instead involved a tort case brought by three people, involving no issues of constitutional significance. Kasza was also a tort case, involving no constitutional claims. In contrast, this class action on behalf of hundreds of millions of Americans involves arguably the most sweeping violation of constitutional rights by a President in the nation's history. As this Court previously noted, "no case dismissed because its 'very subject matter' was a state secret involved ongoing, widespread violations of individual constitutional rights." Hepting, 439 F.Supp.2d at 993.

This is significant. Here defendants seek to use a common law privilege to deny plaintiffs a judicial forum to assert their Fourth Amendment right to be free from a Dragnet surveillance program. But as the Supreme Court held in Webster, a case that post-dates Reynolds, a "serious constitutional question . . . would arise" if even "a federal statute were construed to deny any judicial forum for a colorable constitutional claim." Webster, 486 U.S. at 603 (citation omitted). In Webster, the plaintiff (unlike Plaintiffs here) did contract with and work for the United States (in the CIA). Notwithstanding plaintiff's status as a former CIA employee, and notwithstanding the CIA Director's claim that "judicial review even of [plaintiff's] constitutional claims" will be "to the detriment of national security," id. at 604, the Supreme Court refused to dismiss the case. Instead, and in contrast to Reynolds (which involved no constitutional claim), the Court instructed the district court to "balance [plaintiff's] need for access to proof which would support a colorable constitutional claim against the extraordinary needs of the CIA for confidentiality and the protection of its methods, sources, and mission." Id.; see also Stehney v. Perry, 101 F.3d 925, 934 (3rd Cir. 1996) (permitting plaintiff to mount constitutional challenge to the NSA's revocation of her national security clearance in part to avoid the "serious constitutional question that would arise if a federal statute were construed to deny any judicial forum for a colorable constitutional claim").

Defendants ask the Court to deny plaintiffs a judicial forum to vindicate their Fourth Amendment rights. That Webster does not permit. The Webster court was familiar with Reynolds. It cited Reynolds. But the Webster court struck a different balance where constitutional rights were at stake–permitting the case to proceed, discovery to be held, and a careful balancing of the parties' respective interests.

This case is even stronger than Webster, because Congress passed a law (FISA) authorizing discovery, not requiring dismissal. The constitutional interests at stake here are also far greater than in Webster. Webster involved a single plaintiff, asserting fairly weak constitutional claims.[23] Shubert is a putative class of millions of Americans, asserting extremely serious violations of the Fourth Amendment. Defendants' radical attempt to deny plaintiffs a judicial forum to assert their Fourth Amendment claims must be rejected. Webster, 486 U.S. at 603.[24]

[23]See Webster, 486 U.S. at 602 ("We share the confusion of the Court of Appeals as to the precise nature of respondent's constitutional claims.").

[24]El-Masri v. Tenet, 479 F.3d 296 (4th Cir. 2007), cited by defendants, failed even to cite Webster, much less distinguish it. El-Masri is also inapposite because it did not involve a statute "contemplating the trial of actions that by their very nature concern security information," Halpern, 258 F.2d at 44, see supra § II(A); nor a program already largely "in the public record,"

3. Reynolds, Which Was Decided In a Considerably Different Factual Context, Does Not Require Dismissal

Reynolds is distinguishable in at least five further respects. First, Reynolds involved persons who volunteered to go on a plainly military mission. Totten, Tenet, and Kasza all involved persons working for the military. But plaintiffs here did not join, observe, contract with, or spy for the United States military or a United States intelligence agency. The named plaintiffs did not. The putative plaintiff class did not. Plaintiffs are ordinary Americans, as far removed from the United States military and intelligence establishment as is possible in any case.

In Reynolds, there was no reason even to believe that the withheld information implicating state secrets "had any causal connection with the accident." 345 U.S. at 11. The secret electronic equipment in that case was irrelevant to prove the plaintiffs' case. In contrast, defendants here seek not only to withhold all discovery (including any and all discovery they have relevant to plaintiffs' case), they seek to dismiss the case entirely.

In Reynolds, defendants "formally offered to make the surviving crew members available for examination," an offer plaintiffs rejected but that the Supreme Court believed "should have been accepted." Id. Whatever minimal harm was caused to plaintiffs' case by the failure to produce an irrelevant report on the electronic equipment was more than minimized by the government's offer to produce live witnesses. This case stands in stark contrast. The Hepting, 439 F.Supp.2d at 994, see infra § II(C)(4). In addition, El-Masri, which dealt with the detention of a foreign citizen in a foreign country, did not concern a military intrusion into domestic American affairs. See Youngstown Sheet, 343 U.S. at 587; Al-Marri, 2007 WL 1663712. El-Masri also concluded that a single plaintiff's "personal interest in pursuing his civil claim is subordinated to the collective interest in national security." Id. at 313. Here the collective interest of millions of Americans in preserving both FISA and the Fourth Amendment throughout the United States is at least as great as the security interest asserted by defendants.

withheld discovery (i.e., all discovery) is extremely relevant, and defendants have provided no alternative: no witnesses, no documents, nothing at all besides a demand for dismissal.

Unlike Reynolds (but like Youngstown Sheet), this case involves a startling encroachment of the Executive into the domestic sphere. The Dragnet program monitors, intercepts, and searches the contents of hundreds of millions of phone calls and emails made within the United States, calls by ordinary Americans to their family, friends, and others. Compl. ¶¶ 1-3, 53-90. The Dragnet program is far more intrusive within the domestic sphere than President Truman's unconstitutional actions, which affected a limited number of steel mills. Reynolds simply had no occasion to consider the privilege within such a context.

Unlike Reynolds (but like Al-Marri, 2007 WL 1663712), this case also involves a "military intrusion into civilian affairs." Laird, 408 U.S. at 15. This is no minor intrusion, but–as alleged–the most widespread and substantial "military intrusion into civilian affairs" since the Civil War. The National Security Agency, which is the intelligence arm of the Department of Defense, is now engaged in a national electronic quartering program, monitoring the daily lives of millions of ordinary Americans: their conversations, their email, their internet use. Reynolds, which dealt with secret electronic equipment on a military aircraft, again had no occasion to consider the privilege in this context.

"[E]ven the state secrets privilege has its limits." Hepting, 439 F.Supp.2d at 995. The privilege as defined in Reynolds applies only to "military matters," but the Dragnet surveillance of millions of phone calls and emails by ordinary Americans within this country is a civilian matter, not a military one. The test set forth in Reynolds does not and cannot apply where, as here, constitutional rights are at stake. See Webster, 486 U.S. at 603. Rather, courts have "latitude to control any discovery process which may be instituted so as to balance [plaintiffs'] need for access to proof which would support a colorable constitutional claim against the extraordinary needs of the [government] for confidentiality and the protection of its methods, sources, and mission." Id. at 604.

The Court in Reynolds, in that limited, straightforward case, could not possibly have imagined that any executive would so misuse the state secrets privilege, as to attempt to apply it to sweeping, criminal, unconstitutional conduct reaching into the heartland of this country. As this Court noted, "While the court recognizes and respects the executive's constitutional duty to protect the nation from threats, the court also takes seriously its constitutional duty to adjudicate the disputes that come before it . . . . To defer to a blanket assertion of secrecy here would be to abdicate that duty." Hepting, 439 F.Supp.2d at 995 (citation omitted).

Just as "[t]he President cannot eliminate constitutional protections with the stroke of a pen by proclaiming a civilian, even a criminal civilian, an enemy combatant subject to indefinite military detention," Al-Marri, 2007 WL 1663712, at *27, the President's intelligence chief cannot, with the stroke of a declaration, conceal and effectively immunize a criminal Dragnet program that subjects hundreds of millions of ordinary Americans to round-the-clock surveillance by the United States military. "For a court to uphold a claim to such extraordinary power would do more than render lifeless" the Fourth Amendment, plaintiffs' right to a judicial forum, the constitutional right and duty of Article III courts to "say what the law is," Marbury, 5 U.S. at 177, and fundamental constitutional limitations upon the Executive within the domestic sphere, see Youngstown Sheet, 343 U.S. at 587. "[I]t would effectively undermine all of the freedoms guaranteed by the Constitution." Al-Marri, 2007 WL 1663712, at *29.

The Executive offers no limiting principle–none–for its breathtaking extension of the state secrets privilege. In defendants' view, any illegal conduct, any unconstitutional conduct, any violation of law–no matter how many people it affects, no matter how violative it is of fundamental rights–cannot be stopped, or even revealed, so long as revelation of the conduct might harm national security. Even a secret program to put a camera in every American's bedroom could not be revealed, if to reveal it might harm national security. But the Executive cannot transform a limited evidentiary privilege into de facto executive immunity for violations of the Constitution and federal criminal laws. Such an awesome power "either has no beginning or it has no end. If it exists, it need submit to no legal restraint. . . . . [It may not] plunge us straightway into dictatorship, but it is at least a step in that direction." Youngstown Sheet, 343 U.S. at 653 (Jackson, J., concurring).

4. Because the Content Monitoring Program Is Not Secret, It Is Not a "State Secret"

Defendants' motion should be denied for yet another reason. As this Court previously held, defendants' content monitoring program is "hardly a secret," much less a "state secret." Hepting, 439 F.Supp.2d at 994. Defendants publicly "admitted the existence" of the program, that it "monitor[s] communication content," "tracks calls into the United States or out of the United States," and "operates without warrants." Id. at 992 (citations omitted). Because the "very subject matter of this action is hardly a secret," the state secrets privilege cannot bar this suit. Id. at 994; see also Jencks v. United States, 353 U.S. 657, 675 (1957) (Burton, J., concurring) ("Once the defendant learns the state secret . . . the underlying basis for the privilege disappears, and there usually remains little need to conceal the privileged evidence from the jury. Thus, when the Government is a party, the preservation of these privileges is dependent upon nondisclosure of the privileged evidence to the defendant.").

The Executive has also "opened the door for judicial inquiry by publicly confirming and denying material information about its monitoring of communication content." Hepting, 439 F.Supp.2d at 996. Defendants cannot both deny the existence of a broader Dragnet, and claim that the state secrets privilege prevents them from making such a denial. Yet that is what the Executive does here. In support of this motion, defendants submitted a declaration from Keith Alexander, Director of the National Security Agency, swearing that "Plaintiffs' allegations of a content surveillance dragnet are false." See Public Alexander Declaration, May 25, 2007 ¶ 16. "If the government's public disclosures have been truthful," discovery regarding those disclosures "should not reveal any new information that would assist a terrorist and adversely affect national security." But "if the government has not been truthful, the state secrets privilege should not serve as a shield for its false public statements." Hepting, 439 F.Supp.2d at 996.[25] The existence of defendants' warrantless content surveillance program is plainly not subject to the state secrets privilege.

D. The Totten/Tenet Bar Does Not Apply

Both Totten and Tenet dealt with the disclosure of secret espionage relationships. Plaintiffs are not spies, "made no agreement with the government and are not bound by any [25]Were it otherwise, the state secrets privilege would simply be a license for government officials to lie.

implied covenant of secrecy." Hepting, 439 F.Supp.2d at 991; cf. Totten, 92 U.S. at 106; see also Tenet, 544 U.S. at 10 (further restricting narrow Totten rule to suits brought by "alleged former sp[ies]," not to "acknowledged (though covert) employee[s] of the CIA"). For the reasons set forth in Hepting, the narrow Totten/Tenet bar is irrelevant to this case.

III. Defendants' Standing Argument Is a Red Herring

For the reasons set forth in Hepting, defendants' attempt to dismiss this case on standing grounds should be rejected. See id., 439 F.Supp.2d at 999-1001. "[T]he core component of standing is an essential and unchanging part of the case-or-controversy requirement of Article III." Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 560 (1992). A plaintiff must satisfy three elements to have standing: (1) "the plaintiff must have suffered an injury in fact–an invasion of a legally protected interest which is (a) concrete and particularized and (b) actual or imminent, not conjectural or hypothetical"; (2) "there must be a causal connection between the injury and the conduct complained of"; and (3) "it must be likely, as opposed to merely speculative, that the injury will be redressed by a favorable decision." Id. at 560-61 (internal quotation marks and citations omitted).

The Complaint plainly alleges all three elements.[26] The "President of the United States authorized a secret program to spy upon millions of innocent Americans, including the [26]"For purposes of ruling on a motion to dismiss for want of standing, both the trial and reviewing courts must accept as true all material allegations of the complaint, and must construe the complaint in favor of the complaining party." Wilbur, 423 F.3d at 1107 (citation omitted). In addition, "[a]t the pleading stage, general factual allegations of injury resulting from the defendant's conduct may suffice, for on a motion to dismiss we presume that general allegations embrace those specific facts that are necessary to support the claim." Lujan, 504 U.S. at 561 (citation and internal quotation marks omitted).

named plaintiffs." Id. ¶ 2. The program "intercept[ed], search[ed], seiz[ed], and subject[ed] to surveillance the content of [their] personal phone conversations and email." Id. The program has operated and continues to operate "without a warrant, court order or any other lawful authorization." Id. ¶ 1. The named plaintiffs have been and continue to be spied upon illegally pursuant to the program. Id. ¶¶ 5-8.[27] "Plaintiffs are 'aggrieved person[s]' as defined in 50 U.S.C. § 1810, are not foreign powers or agents of a foreign power, and were subjected to electronic surveillance conducted or authorized by defendants pursuant to the Spying Program in violation of 50 U.S.C. § 1809," id. ¶ 98, and are therefore entitled to damages under 50 U.S.C. § 1810 (FISA). Plaintiffs are also alleged to be "aggrieved persons" as defined by the Wiretap Act and the Stored Communications Act, and are entitled to damages pursuant to those statutes. Id. ¶¶ 102-108. Finally, "by conducting, authorizing, and/or participating in the electronic surveillance of plaintiffs, and by searching and seizing the contents of plaintiffs' communications without reasonable suspicion or probable cause, and failing to prevent their fellow government officers from engaging in this unconstitutional conduct, defendants deprived plaintiffs of rights, remedies, privileges, and immunities guaranteed under the Fourth Amendment of the United States Constitution." Id. ¶ 110.

In short, plaintiffs (1) were illegally spied upon and are being spied upon (2) by defendants and are (3) entitled to damages. Should the Court enjoin defendants' illegal program, the Court will also redress an ongoing legal violation directly traceable to defendants, that will prevent further injury to plaintiffs. These allegations plainly establish standing, and defendants do not suggest otherwise. See American Civil Liberties Union v. National Security Agency, 2007

[27]Further aspects of the program are set forth in paragraphs 53-90 of the Complaint.

WL 1952370, at *5 (6th Cir. July 6, 2007) ("If . . . a plaintiff could demonstrate that her privacy had actually been breached (i.e., that her communications had actually been wiretapped), then she would have standing to assert a Fourth Amendment cause of action for breach of privacy."); Defendants' Memorandum of Law dated May 26, 2007 ("Def. Br."), at 26 (conceding that "aggrieved persons" as defined by FISA, the Wiretap Act, and the Stored Communications Act have standing to assert violations of those statutes); Director, Office of Workers' Comp. Programs v. Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co., 514 U.S. 122, 126 (1995) ("aggrieved" is a well-known term of art used to "designate those who have standing") (cited by defendants at Def. Br. 26).[28]

To the contrary, defendants concede that plaintiffs have alleged standing. As defendants put it, "persons whose rights were injured by the actual interception or disclosure of their own communications (or records) have standing." Def. Br. 26. Defendants instead are reduced to claiming that plaintiffs will not ultimately be able, at some future time, to prove standing because of the state secrets privilege. The standing argument is no more than state secrets revisited, and for all the reasons set forth in section II, supra, the argument fails. "[T]he state secrets privilege will not prevent plaintiffs from receiving at least some evidence tending to establish the factual predicate for the injury-in-fact underlying their claims." Hepting, 439

[28]As in Hepting, "the gravamen of plaintiffs' complaint is that [defendants] created a dragnet" that collected the content of plaintiffs' communications. Hepting, 439 F.Supp.2d at 1000. "[T]he alleged injury is concrete even though it is widely shared. Despite [defendants'] alleged creation of a dragnet to intercept all or substantially all of [plaintiffs'] communications, this dragnet necessarily inflicts a concrete injury that affects each [plaintiff] in a distinct way." Id. at 1001 (citing FEC v. Akins, 524 U.S. 11, 24 (1998) ("[W]here a harm is concrete, though widely shared, the Court has found 'injury in fact.'")).

F.Supp.2d at 1001.[29] In addition, "additional facts might very well be revealed during, but not as a direct consequence of, this litigation that obviate many of the secrecy concerns currently at issue" regarding the program and therefore "it is unclear whether the privilege would necessarily block [defendants] from revealing information" about the program. Id. Finally, for the many other reasons set forth in Section II, supra, the state secrets privilege does not apply and, even if it did, will not bar plaintiffs from establishing the factual predicate for the injury-in-fact underlying their claims.

A. The Sixth Circuit Opinion in ACLU v. NSA Does Not Help Defendants

Defendants will undoubtedly attempt to rely upon the recent opinions in American Civil Liberties Union v. National Security Agency, 2007 WL 1952370 (6th Cir. July 6, 2007), which dismissed the ACLU's limited challenge to the TSP on standing grounds. ACLU is irrelevant to this case for a number of reasons.[30]

ACLU turned on a number of factors not present here. First, the case presented a "relatively unique procedural posture": plaintiffs moved for partial summary judgment based on a statement of undisputed facts and defendants cross-moved for summary judgment. Because, on a motion for summary judgment, "the plaintiff can no longer rest on mere allegations" (as they can do at the pleading stage) "but must set forth by affidavit or other evidence specific facts," Lujan, 504 U.S. at 561 (internal quotation marks omitted), and because plaintiffs "failed to provide evidence that they are personally subject to the TSP," the ACLU plaintiffs could not establish standing. ACLU, 2007 WL 1952370, at *34, 39.

[29]In light of the many admissions by, inter alia, the President, the Attorney General, and General Hayden, and the Klein and Marcus declarations noted in Hepting, 439 F.Supp.2d at 1001, there is "at least some factual basis for plaintiffs' standing," id., and it is absurd for defendants to suggest that this case is a "groundless fishing expedition." Def. Br. at 33.

[30]As a preliminary matter, the opinion of Judge Batchelder is of little precedential value, because the concurring judge concurred only in the judgment and the concurrence is more narrow than Judge Batchelder's opinion. See Panetti v. Quarterman, 127 S.Ct. 2842, 2856 (2007) ("When there is no majority opinion, the narrower holding controls.").

Here, of course, plaintiffs have not moved for summary judgment, nor set forth a set of undisputed facts. Defendants' motion comes at the pleading stage, before they have even answered.[31] In this posture, "general factual allegations of injury resulting from the defendant's conduct may suffice, for on a motion to dismiss we presume that general allegations embrace those specific facts that are necessary to support the claim." Lujan, 504 U.S. at 561; see Hepting, 439 F.Supp.2d at 999 (same). There is no dispute that the factual allegations of injury set forth in the Complaint establish plaintiffs' standing.

Second, in ACLU, "plaintiffs [did] not challenge[] the government's invocation of the [state secrets] privilege or its application." ACLU, 2007 WL 1952370, at *38 (concurrence). Based on this failure, both the concurrence and Judge Batchelder assumed, with little analysis, that the privilege applied and would have precluded plaintiffs (had they asked) from determining whether or not they were in fact surveilled. Id.

In contrast, plaintiffs here vigorously contest both the invocation of the state secrets privilege and its application. Plaintiffs do not concede that the state secrets privilege applies; rather, the FISA statute controls, see supra § II(A); the state secrets privilege does not by its own terms apply to this case, see supra § II(C)(1); Webster requires balancing of the parties' interests, and the provision of some discovery, see supra § II(C)(2); even if Reynolds applied, it would not preclude discovery further demonstrating plaintiffs' injury-in-fact, see supra § II(C)(3); and defendants' actions are not even secret, much less "state secrets," see supra § II(C)(4).

[31]Defendants' alternative "summary judgment" motion is also improper and premature. See supra n.7.

Third, the ACLU plaintiffs never alleged that they were surveilled; rather, they alleged that it was possible that they were surveilled, creating a "chilling effect" on their ability to communicate with their clients. While the Sixth Circuit panel was deeply divided as to whether this chilling effect was sufficient to create injury-in-fact,[32] the debate is of no moment here, where plaintiffs alleged that they have been surveilled, many times, under defendants' Dragnet program. See, e.g., Compl. ¶¶ 1-2, 5-8. As defendants concede, a plaintiff who has been surveilled unquestionably has standing to challenge the surveillance. Def. Br. 26.

Fourth, the ACLU plaintiffs only sought injunctive relief, not damages. To the extent Judges Batchelder and Gibbons believed that any future surveillance of plaintiffs was speculative, they ruled that the request for injunctive relief was precluded by City of Los Angeles v. Lyons, 461 U.S. 95 (1983), which held that a purely speculative fear of future injury (there, the fear of a future arrest and choke hold by some hypothetical, future police officer in violation of city policy) did not create standing to request prospective injunctive relief. Lyons, though, is of [32] Cf. ACLU, 2007 WL 1952370, at *36 ("[A] plaintiff must be actually subject to the defendant's conduct, not simply afraid of being subject to it"); id. at *45 ("All that was required was that they demonstrate that . . . they possessed a reasonable fear of harm . . . . The existence of the TSP is undisputed and these plaintiffs are personally affected by the TSP whether they engage in targeted communications or not.") (Gilman, J., dissenting). In the Ninth Circuit, Judge Gilman's dissenting view would plainly have prevailed. See The Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.) v. United States, 870 F.2d 518, 521-22 (9th Cir. 1989) (Church has standing where fear of surveillance chilled congregants from participating in church services).

no relevance to claims that assert damages. Id. In addition, plaintiffs here (unlike plaintiffs in ACLU) allege that they are currently subject to an existing, ongoing Dragnet program, and will continue to be subject to the program until the program is enjoined by a federal court.

Finally, in ACLU the government argued that, because plaintiffs there did communicate with Al Qaeda suspects, the warrantless TSP could not chill those conversations, because they would have been monitored with or without a FISA warrant.[33] The argument is of no relevance here. Plaintiffs–millions of ordinary Americans–do not communicate with Al Qaeda and are not agents of a foreign government. No FISA court would provide defendants a warrant to spy upon hundreds of millions of phone conversations and emails by and between ordinary Americans. See 50 U.S.C. § 1801 et seq. (setting forth requirements for FISA warrant). If the Court were to enjoin the Dragnet, the Dragnet would end and plaintiffs would no longer be subject to any surveillance. The ongoing harm to plaintiffs–a startling loss of privacy of unprecedented scope–would plainly be redressed by an injunction to stop the Dragnet program.

At the pleading stage, plaintiffs have established standing. Defendants' motion should be denied.[34]

[33]This analysis is flawed for the many reasons set forth in Plaintiffs' Supplemental Memorandum in Center for Constitutional Rights v. Bush, Case No, 07-1115, dated July 9, 2006, at 16-17.

[34]In a footnote, defendants suggest that the United States has not waived sovereign immunity for damages under the statutes at issue here. Motions made in a footnote are waived. See, e.g., Hilao v. Estate of Marcos, 103 F.3d 767, 778 n.4 (9th Cir. 1996); see also Retlaw Broadcasting Co. v. N.L.R.B., 53 F.3d 1002, 1005 n.1 (9th Cir. 1995). In any event, defendants are wrong. FISA explicitly and unequivocally waives sovereign immunity. It provides a cause of action for damages against any "person" who commits unlawful electronic surveillance in violation of 50 U.S.C. § 1809. FISA defines a "person" to include "any officer or employee of the Federal Government." 50 U.S.C. § 1801(m). An action against federal officers and employees in their official capacities "is considered a suit against the United States." Multi

IV. Defendants' Statutory Arguments Fail

A. Neither Statute Requires Dismissal

Defendants' statutory arguments also fail. Defendants now concede, as they must, that neither Section 6 of the National Security Act of 1959, 50 U.S.C. § 402 note, nor Section 102A(i)(1) of the Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act of 2004, 50 U.S.C. § 403-1(i)(1), requires dismissal. See Def. Br. 38 ("The Court observed that 'neither [statute] requires the court to dismiss this action.' That is true.") (citing Hepting).

The concession disposes of the argument. "Neither of these provisions by their terms requires the court to dismiss this action and it would be premature for the court to do so at this time." Hepting, 439 F.Supp.2d at 998; see Al-Haramain, 451 F.Supp.2d at 1227 (denying the government's motion to dismiss on the basis of the statutory provisions: "[t]he statutory privileges at issue here do not direct the dismissal of this action, nor am I yet convinced that they

Denominational Ministry v. Gonzales, 474 F.Supp.2d 1133, 1140 (N.D.Cal. 2007). By prescribing civil damages liability for FISA violations by federal officers or employees, and hence the United States, FISA waives federal sovereign immunity. See Salazar v. Heckler, 787 F.2d 527, 529 (10th Cir. 1986) (Title VII of Civil Rights Act of 1974, which authorized civil actions for employment discrimination by specifying "the head" of an offending federal entity as defendant, see 42 U.S.C. § 2000e-16(c), waives sovereign immunity despite failure to specify "the United States"); Rochon v. Gonzales, 438 F.3d 1211, 1215-16 (D.C. Cir. 2006) (same).

FISA also waives sovereign immunity because it defines "person" to include any "entity," without excepting the United States, as do, for example, provisions of the Electronic Communications Privacy Act (ECPA). See 18 U.S.C. § 2520 (authorizing cause of action against a "person or entity, other than the United States"), § 2707(a) (same). "Entity" includes "governmental entities" such as the United States. See Organizacion JD Ltda v. U.S. Dept. Of Justice, 18 F.3d 91, 94 (2nd Cir. 1994) (in former ECPA: "person or entity" includes "governmental entity"); Adams v. City of Battle Creek, 250 F.3d 980, 985 (6th Cir. 2001) (same). Had Congress meant to except "the United States" from the scope of the word "entity" in section 1801(m), Congress could and would have done so.

will block evidence necessary to plaintiffs' case."). Both statutes are simply irrelevant to the motion.

At best for defendants, these statutes may or may not be relevant to disputes that later arise in discovery. See Hepting, 439 F.Supp.2d at 998 ("After discovery begins, the court will determine step-by-step whether the privileges prevent plaintiffs from discovering particular evidence. But the mere existence of these privileges does not justify dismissing this case now."); Al-Haramain, 451 F.Supp.2d at 1227 ("In proceeding with the discovery process, the government is free to identify discovery requests that fall within these other statutory privileges, and explain specifically why this is so, and I will determine whether the privileges prevent plaintiffs from discovering that specific evidence."); Founding Church of Scientology v. NSA, 610 F.2d 824, 833 (D.C. Cir. 1979) (authorizing discovery to develop "the basis for nondisclosure or the lack of it").

B. FISA Supplants the Statutory Provisions

The general statutes cited by defendants are also trumped in this case by the specific FISA statute. Section 6 of the National Security Act of 1959 was enacted twenty years prior to FISA and involves the NSA's general authority to withhold certain information (concerning the "organization or any function of the National Security Agency") from public disclosure. 50 U.S.C. § 402 note. FISA is a later, more specifically drawn statute that directly addresses electronic surveillance, the subject matter of this case. "[A] more specific statute will be given precedence over a more general one." Busic v. United States, 446 U.S. 398, 406 (1980); Food & Drug Admin. v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., 529 U.S. 120, 143 (2000) ("At the time a statute is enacted, it may have a range of plausible meanings. Over time, however, subsequent acts can shape or focus those meanings . . . . This is particularly so where the scope of the earlier statute is broad but the subsequent statutes more specifically address the topic at hand. . . . [A] specific policy embedded in a later federal statute should control our construction of the [earlier] statute, even though it ha[s] not been expressly amended.") (internal quotation marks and citations omitted).

Similarly, Section 102A(i)(1)'s generalized directive to the Director of the National Intelligence to protect intelligence sources and methods from unauthorized disclosure cannot overcome FISA's more detailed provisions. FISA's specific and relevant directives, concerning the precise subject matter of this action, prevail over Section 102(A)(i)(1) and control the outcome of this action. See Busic, 446 U.S. at 406.[35]

C. On Its Face, Section 102(a)(i)(1) Applies to the DNI, Not to the Court

Section 102A(i)(1) provides: "The Director of National Intelligence shall protect intelligence sources and methods from unauthorized disclosure." This section does no more than "instruct[] the Director of National Intelligence to take measures that are available to prevent disclosure regarding intelligence sources and methods–for example, by asserting the state secrets privilege." Terkel v. AT&T Corp., 441 F.Supp.2d 899, 906 (N.D.Ill. 2006). That has been done. On its face, this section requires no more. Its command is directed to the DNI and no one else.[36]

[35]Not one of the cases cited by defendants involved a FISA claim or the interplay between FISA and these two statutes.

[36]The cases cited by defendants simply hold that the predecessor to Section 102A(i)(1) qualified as a "withholding statute" for purposes of Exemption 3 of the Freedom of Information Act. See CIA v. Sims, 471 U.S. 159, 167-68 (1985); Fitzgibbon v. CIA, 911 F.2d 755 (D.C. Cir. 1990). Snepp v. United States, 444 U.S. 507 (1980) does not concern either Section 102A(i)(1) or Section 6.

This section certainly does not require a court to abrogate its responsibility to adjudicate cases, nor to ignore the plain language of another statute specifically providing a discovery protocol where electronic surveillance is at issue. See 50 U.S.C. § 1806(f).

The DNI has presumably complied with this section and that is the end of this section's relevance to this case.

D. The Statutes Plainly Do Not Preclude Discovery From Third-Parties

Fourth, neither statute applies to discovery from third parties, such as the telecommunications providers who transferred the content of millions of phone and internet communications to the government. The cases cited by defendants apply (at best) only to direct discovery of the government, and then almost exclusively, to the unique interplay between FOIA and those statutes.[37] But discovery from third-parties will reveal substantial information in support of plaintiffs' claims.

E. Defendants' Interpretation of the Statutes Raises Serious Constitutional Concerns

Finally, defendants' reading of the statutes raises serious constitutional concerns. "[I]t would allow the federal government to conceal information regarding blatantly illegal or unconstitutional activities simply by assigning these activities to the NSA or claiming they implicated information about the NSA's functions." Terkel, 441 F.Supp.2d at 905; see also Hayden, 608 F.2d at 1389 (limiting Section 6 cases to where the NSA "function or activity is authorized by statute and not otherwise unlawful") (emphasis added). But a court should be "hard-pressed to read section 6 as essentially trumping every other Congressional enactment and Constitutional provision." Terkel, 441 F.Supp.2d at 905. As the Supreme Court held in Webster, a "serious constitutional question . . . would arise if a federal statute were construed to deny any judicial forum for a colorable constitutional claim." Id., 486 U.S. at 603 (citation omitted).

[37]Sims, 471 U.S. at 167-68 (CIA could withhold information under FOIA exemptions); Founding Church, 610 F.2d 824 (NSA could withhold information under FOIA exemptions); Hayden v. NSA, 608 F.2d 1381 (D.C. Cir. 1979) (same); People for the Am. Way Found. v. NSA, 462 F.Supp.2d 21 (D.D.C. 2006) (same)

The doctrine of constitutional avoidance also compels the Court not to adopt defendants' reading. "If an otherwise acceptable construction of a statute would raise serious constitutional problems, and where an alternative interpretation of the statute is fairly possible, we are obligated to construe the statute to avoid such problems." Ramadan v. Gonzales, 479 F.3d 646, 654 (9th Cir. 2007) (citation omitted). Reading Section 6 or Section 102A(i)(1) to preclude millions of Americans from asserting their Fourth Amendment right to be free from an electronic eavesdropping dragnet would, to put it mildly, "raise serious constitutional problems." Id.; Webster, 486 U.S. at 603.

The Court, however, need not reach the doctrine of constitutional avoidance, because neither statute requires dismissal of the Complaint or of plaintiffs' constitutional claims. "Neither of these provisions . . . requires the court to dismiss this action." Hepting, 439 F.Supp.2d at 998.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, plaintiffs respectfully request that this Court (1) determine that the Complaint states a valid legal claim; (2) deny defendants' motion in its entirety; and (3) grant such other relief as is just and proper.
